There had been no fracture of either the commendation of the commendation o arm, though both were thoroughly examined. In consequence of the presence of a large storp, which for some reason or other had been placed on the chest of the deceased, it was impossible to determine whether there had been any injury to it before death or not. The sternum was detached from its card-leginous articulations with the costal bones on both sides, but considering the decomposed state of the body, the weight of the storn was sufficient to cause such a condition. The physician who examined it was perfectly satisfied in his own actal that no injury to the chest had occurred before death. There was, however, a fracture of the left wrist. If the men charged with manislanghter are guilty, we hope they may be made an example of.
